(A SHORT STORY)

CHAPTER I.

The little French hotel was quite full for the first time in its existence.

One lovely June evening most of the visitors were out of doors; some sauntering in little groups round the rather stiff hotel gardens.

They would have been a little distressed if they could have heard the nature of the conversation which they fondly imagined to be composed of soft words and glances and eloquent silences.

He struck a couple of vests, succeeded in keeping the third alight, and took out his watch.

"I say, it's twenty past nine!" "Good gracious! I shall catch it, and I've been with you ever since dinner."

"Oh, come now," with an aggrieved look, "what if you have? I'm not a dangerous lunatic!"

"No, you're awfully jolly," she replied, with convincing frankness; "but, all the same, Aunt would say you're not a proper companion for an hour and a half."

"I'm going. Good-bye, Mr. Lyon." "Off she went, running lightly and swiftly over the hard sand.

"Come along," he said, catching her hand, "it's quite dusk; let's run up together. First-rate floor for running these sands make."

It was some distance to the entrance of the hotel, and the two arrived panting and laughing.

"Shall I come on and tell Mrs. Russell it's all my fault you're late? I will if you think there'll be any row."

"Oh, no, I shall do better alone. Oh, yes, thanks, I'm going to pile it all on you."

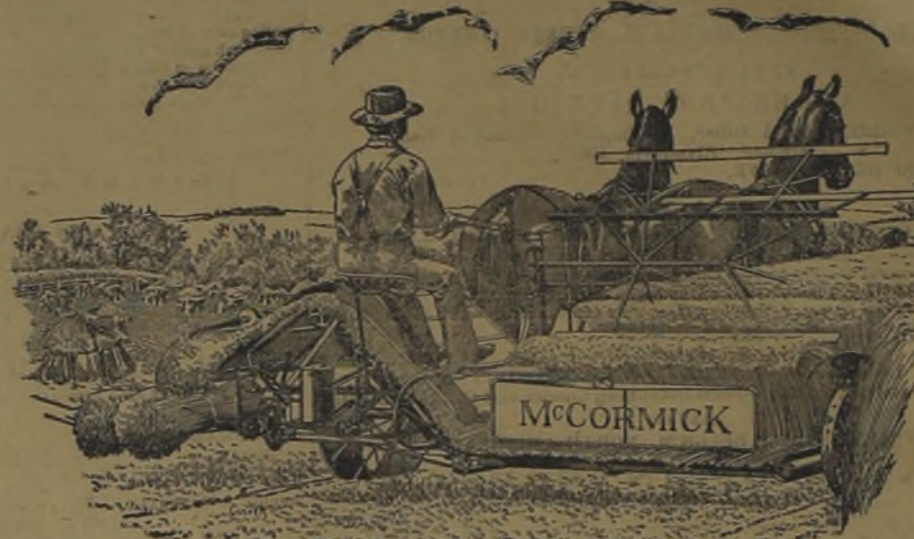

"Mind you do." He raised his straw hat, and the girl noticed a bright farewell, and went towards the house at a more sedate pace.

With the smile still on his lips, Lyon pulled out a cigarette case, selected a cigarette, and was about to light up, when there was a slight rustle, and, as he looked up, a girl emerged from the trees near by.

Lyon forgot his cigarette as he stared after her. Then he struck a match reflectively.
