(A SHORT STORY.)

'By Jove, what a confounded smash he exclaimed, gazing ruefully at the chaos the impetuous little woman had created in her hasty flight. 'Look here, Tom, if my wife often takes this way of maintaining her rights, it will be horribly rough on the furniture. What a spirit the girl has, and how she threw down that book! My dear fellow, it was grand.'

'Yes; this might be described as throwing down the gauntlet with a vengeance,' I replied. 'There it lies, a visible evidence of your defeat; for I'm afraid you have not come off with flying colours at present.'

'I'll go and talk to the Wright,' I said resignedly. 'I'd rather like to try if I can work upon her envy or jealousy. If I can, it may be of great use to us. Detain Mrs. Durant here if she should come back.'

'Thanks, Tom. You are a good fellow, and he wrung my hand heartily. He knew it required some pluck to encounter Miss Clementina Wright.'

I met her in my most agreeable mood, and, after a preliminary allusion to the weather, commenced the campaign in earnest.

'Thanks so much for all you have told me, Miss Wright. I never had such a clear idea of what you mean by 'woman's rights' before.'

'Probably,' she replied, 'you never before heard them elucidated by one who is an advocate of the cause.'

'Never. It is really very— I was about to say amusing, but saved myself just in time, and substituted 'instructive, and I don't wonder you devote yourself to the cause, heart and soul.'

'This was true enough, for I never doubted that in some mysterious way she found the 'cause' a paying concern; under these circumstances I never distrust devotion.'

'Yes, it is a grand cause, and nobly worthy of the sacrifices I have made to maintain it.'

'Ah! every noble cause demands,' sacrifices,' I observed. Miss Clementina Wright sighed, and her grim visage relaxed a little.

'Too true,' she replied; 'and those of us who would seek to restore to woman her rights must be content to offer up on the altar of our mission all petty prejudice and foolish vanities.'

'As she spoke we had entered the verandah, and I now paused between the library and drawing-room windows, where I continued the conversation within hearing, as I hoped, of both.'

'In Mrs. Durant I should think you have a most enthusiastic partisan.'

'Enthusiastic, but inconsequent. There are many points which she will not concede, and without which her support is useless. For instance look at her hair.'

'What is the matter with Mrs. Durant's hair?' I asked, with well-feigned surprise. 'Rather nice, isn't it?'

'She gave me a sharp look, and when she spoke it was with considerable temper.'

'Have you observed the manner which in she wears it? So frivolously elaborate. No woman with a mission should waste so much time and trouble on trifles. Observe the manner in which I dispose of mine. Is it not far simpler?'

'Simple enough in all conscience,' I replied, with commendable gravity. 'Why don't you recommend it to Mrs. Durant?'

'I have already done so, and even offered to cut hers for her; but she declines altogether. While she wears it so frivolously she will never look like a strong-minded and rational woman.'

I felt thankful that she was right, but it would scarcely have served my purpose to have told her so, so I contented myself with observing:

'I fear you are but too kind and considerate, Miss Wright; for really, with her dress and style, Mrs. Durant does not look at all a suitable companion for Miss Clementina Wright, the greatest woman of the age.'

'You are right,' she said grimly; 'but on that point even I cannot move her.'

circumstances. A pretty little fool like that! I perceived with satisfaction that even Miss Clementina Wright was not superior to all the weaknesses of her sex.'

'But you told her yourself that she was the 'chosen champion of her sex.' Miss Wright made a gesture of contemptuous dismissal.

'That was merely to encourage her. Such expressions mean nothing with us.'

'I see. Then she really has no influence with you?' 'Not the slightest. If our acquaintance gives rise to such a supposition, I shall drop it at once.'

A stifled exclamation from the drawing-room made us turn hastily. Beatrice Durant was standing at window, and one glance at her face told me that she had heard all.
