Alfonso the Matador

(A SHORT STORY.)

She asked it with a vivacity that seemed to have little sympathy in it. One would have supposed she was propounding an ordinary comment...

'I do not know. The excitement of these last days may have un-nerved me a little; I cannot tell. You know, dearest, I do wrong, in spending even these happy hours thus with you...

'Ab, in faith, I am sorry. You must get through to-morrow, Alfonso. Five hundred dollars is a nice, compact little sum. Dios mio! what may not be done with it?'

'In faith, it is good to see you so. A man who does not tremble before the wildest four-year-olds, losing heart when he makes a proposal to a girl...'

'Then you are very wrong for I assure you I am of flesh and blood, and live like you. But to answer your question, my dear, as you know, I am a poor, undowered girl, with nothing but my face, which I am told is, as such, a fortune, go, a passable one. It all depends on yourself then, and your savings, my Alfonso. Five hundred dollars will add solidly to them, and no doubt they will engage you at Madrid...'

'Oh, never fear for that, I'll teach Master Veneno that he has met his match; and you have put new life and strength in me, Dolores, my dear. Waiter, waiter! coracora for two again. Between ourselves, my darling, I fancied I might reckon on your answer, and I have my eye on a charming little villa on the Montserrat road. It will do for the present. Afterwards, when I am Lagartijo the Second, we must go to Madrid, and you shall be dressed as fine as a grandee wife, and Maria santa! no one shall say that Dolores Villanueva married beneath her in taking simple Alfonso Martinez...'

'The Fortunate,' added the girl, again letting her eyes fall on her enthusiastic lover, though with a smile this time that was not altogether pleasing.

'Ah yes; and my reputation shall not fail me now just when it is most needed. Dios mio! the blood is strong in me. One more coracora, waiter. If only Master Veneno and I were timed to meet at eleven o'clock to-night, instead of five to-morrow...'

'It would be bad for you if so, my friend,' said a voice, and a gentleman stepped aside from the promenaders and put a hand upon Alfonso's arm. 'My dear young man, you are out of your wits!'

'Don Felipe, excuse me.' Alfonso the Fortunate rose at once and offered his chair to the newcomer.

'No, no,' was the reply. 'You look as though you were in greater need of it. Take my advice, friend, and be off home at once. An hour more of this kind of thing, and you'll be snapping his thumb and forefinger together, you will be as surely dead to-morrow as Veneno himself. I am astonished at you—I confess it...'

All this was said without any notice having been taken of the girl. Dolores resented the slight, and now, with a toss of the shoulders, ventured the remark.

'Alfonso has but sat here a little while. There can be no great harm in that...'

'None at all, senorita,' was the quick reply. 'Such harm as there is...
