Why, the letter was written to his wife, he thought stupidly. He must have picked it up with his own hand. And now he had read it, and what was he to think? The writing was a man's, beyond a doubt. It was heavy, and large, and bold--very bold, he repeated with a sneer--and then Greek 'E's? Oh yes, that was a man's. But whose? Who was E. P., he wondered dully for a time, until--why Ponsonby--Edward Ponsonby, of course--came like the thrust of a dagger through his heart--Ponsonby who, like his handwriting, was heavy, and large, and bold; and who, he remembered, was coming to dine that very night. That he should have lived to be jealous of a huge, inane, insufferable idiot like Ponsonby, of all men! Not that he had always thought him all or any of those things; he could recollect the time, though it seemed long ago--that very morning, in fact--when he had liked Ponsonby very well, had believed that they were quite the best of friends; but now, all that was changed; and what was he to think with that proof, clear and unmistakable, before him? What should he do? Fortunately for him--if anything could be considered as fortunate where all was so wretchedly anti-thetic to any epithet of the kind--but any way, his wife had never seen the note, so could not miss it, or know that it had gone astray. What should he do?
