A State of Siege. (A SHORT STORY)

(Conclusion) 'I'm afraid I must go back a year or two to make things quite clear,' he began, 'but I'll be as brief as I can. All my misfortunes began with the day I met Stephen Garraway, the old sinner who used to live in this house. It was in Africa that I met him. He was manager of the Byng Reef Diamond Mining Company; I was a clerk in the office at the works.

of course, you know all that. There is a point, though, I should like to clear up. You went straight away from the house this evening when I told you Garraway was dead. 'Well, I couldn't very well suggest that you should put me up, though I might have done even that if I hadn't caught sight of your wife outside the door. I felt pretty sure she'd be at you directly I was gone.

'I suppose you believe what I've told you,' he remarked. I saw no reason for disbelieving it, except that he was not the sort of man on whose word it was advisable to rely with satisfaction. 'Suppose I accept your statement,' I said, 'it does not alter the fact that you have entered my house under false pretences, and--

'Very well, then; it's mine if it's any body's.' I again hesitated, though I could not see what claim any one else could have. But then I had only this rascal's word that it had been promised to him, and I knew enough of law to know that his legal claim was nil.

He quickly forced back a piece of the panelling, disclosing a recess in the thick wall. With a smothered cry of relief he pulled out a small box, which he forced open with his chisel.

Then a cry of dismay burst from him; the box was empty except for a scrap of paper. My excitement was too great to allow me to remain at a distance. I looked over his shoulder, and read the letter at the same time as he.
