"Be Kind to Edith,"

(A SHORT STORY.)

CHAPTER I

I AM the daughter of a Deryshire Vicar who 'spasses rich' in the Peak district on one hundred and twenty pounds a year. There were four of us, two girls and two boys, and how it was all managed I know not, but we never wanted bread and cheese to eat, a warm fire in winter, or decent clothes to wear. We owed no man anything, and never refused a crust to a poor neighbour worse off than ourselves.

But it may be well supposed we had not much to spend on education. My father, himself a Rugby and Cambridge man, was able to teach his boys, and did so most thoroughly and conscientiously, and at fifteen or sixteen the good fellows proposed, of their own accord, to go to the neighbouring towns of Chesterfield and Bakewell as draper's assistants. The thing is not at all uncommon in that district of small clerical preferences. And if my brothers knew more Latin and Greek and less book-keeping than might have been desirable, they made up for it by their strict integrity and pleasant manners to their customers. So we two girls, Mary and myself, were left at home, and very soon we began to feel that we were one too many. My father fell ill, and had to have a doctor, and help in his duty; we lost a cow, and times became not a little hard with us. Now, an old friend of my father's was in the habit of sending us 'The Guardian' a few days after publication, and one evening, as I was glancing over its pages somewhat listlessly, I came to the following advertisement: 'Wanted in a Physician's family a Nursery Governess, or Superior Nurse, to undertake the entire charge of two little children. Lady preferred. Wages twenty pounds. Apply E. Gower Street, London.'

'Why should I not try for this?' I cried on the impulse of the moment. 'Mary can do all the work which mother will let any one do now the boys are gone, and one quarter's wages will pay Mr. Dalton's bill.'

Of course my father said, 'No, no, my dear, we shall get on without that.' Of course my mother shed a few quiet tears at the notion of one of her daughters becoming a servant. Of course Mary threw her arms round my neck, and asked how she should get on without me. Of course the boys, when they were told were angry with me for daring to do what they had done themselves. I am not without a will of my own. A letter was written and a favourable answer received. The children had been left motherless in the year previous. There was one boy and one girl—very easily managed, but not strong in health, requiring care. No menial work would be required of me, a nursemaid being kept. My meals would be served in the nursery. And soon and so on through two sheets of note-paper—well written and expressed, and all perfectly satisfactory. References were exchanged, 'for form's sake' it was said, and within three weeks of my seeing the advertisement I found myself in a third-class carriage of the Midland Railway steaming out of Chesterfield.

I had a compartment all to myself, and rejoiced thereat for two reasons. First, because my good father had expended one of his few precious shillings in buying a book for me; and I was anxious to read it. And secondly, because I had not yet become accustomed to the strictly servant-like apparel which it had been decided in family council that I should wear in my new situation—a perfectly plain light print dress, a straw hat trimmed with brown ribbon, and a black jacket. I found afterwards that might have dressed just as I pleased. But my plain attire was not unbecoming, only I felt a little awkward in it at first, and fancied that every one would know me as a lady-help. I rejoiced therefore in my empty carriage, and read my book, and ate the cake my mother had provided, very comfortably. I am not one to make trouble out of nothing, and I rather enjoyed starting in life on my own account.

inspection as best I might, and only rejoiced to think that London grew near.

Just as the houses began to appear in streets and rows, my fellow passenger opened her mouth, and asked abruptly, and in a hurried manner. 'Are you fond of children?' Of course I supposed that she judged from my dress that I was a nurse, and replied civilly. 'Yes, indeed, ma'am, very fond.'

'You would never be unkind to them?' 'Unkind? No indeed!' She said no more, but continued staring at me until the train stopped. As soon as the door was opened she crossed over the carriage and said in a deep, solemn tone: 'Be kind to Edith.'

'Beware the idea of March,' could not have been uttered in a more alarming way! I started in my seat feeling sure that what I had for some minutes suspected was indeed the case, and that I had travelled with an idiot. I tried to detain her, but she shook me off, sprang from the carriage, and ran rather than walked across the station.

The porter who had opened the door looked at her with some surprise, as she was evidently not very young.

'The lady,' I said, 'is not, I think, quite in her right mind?' 'Think not, miss? Been troublesome to you, or frightened you?' 'Oh, no, no!' I answered, and then I asked him to see to my luggage, and get me a cab, and very soon I was on my way to Gower Street. (To be continued.)
