"HONOUR!"

(A SHORT STORY.)

"I was making towards the sea, following a narrow path that twined in and out amongst furze growths standing up ten or twelve feet from the ground, when suddenly I heard a rustle amongst the furze in front of me, the sound of approaching footsteps, and then Dacre's clear, boyish laugh ringing out in close proximity. Without pausing to consider, I darted aside, pushed through the great wall of prickles that flanked the path, and ensconced myself in a sea of waving broom till he and his companion—I had a good guess who that must be—should have passed by. They came on very slowly, and as I took hold of it I stopped short within a couple of yards from where I stood concealed. Eavesdropping was distasteful, but as I could not have moved hand or foot without attracting their notice I thought it best to maintain my rigid attitude, and waited. Elisa—I could see her distinctly, a beautiful, fair-haired, dimpled Hebe, with all the pouts and prettinesses of a spoilt child—had caught hold of both Dacre's hands and was looking up coaxingly into his face, trying to persuade him to some course of action he was laughingly deprecating as impossible.

"Dacre dearest," she cried, "will you—won't you—will you do it?" "My darling, I can't," he said. "There is no such thing as can't." "But I promised!" "Oh! Promised!" "But I did, I did, really. I gave my word that for two years from today I wouldn't attempt even to remind you of my existence. Not a scrap of my pen shall you see," he went on, with a dismal attempt at gaiety, "for twenty-four whole months. After that you will be of age, and it will be another affair."

"In his turn he had grasped the hands that held his, and had raised them to within measurable distance of his lips. "But, Dacre, do listen, please; it could so easily be managed." "Impossible." "And why, pray? Why should I not have a private correspondence with Maud Wanchoupe, or Clara Beauchamp, or—even Kitty Fisher?" "Elsa!" "Oh, you great stupid! You don't understand. You would only have to address them under cover to Clara; don't you see, and I would do all the rest. Father need never have the least suspicion."

"He had been about to kiss these soft, plump little hands, but he dropped them now instead as if they had burnt him. I saw his lip quiver, and a pained look come into his blue eyes. The little temptress smiled. "Now, Dacre, what in the world is there to prevent your agreeing?" "There flashed through my mind at that moment a sudden perception that this girl was unworthy, and an eager question: Would my boy be true to himself? Relief came quickly. With a little backward toss of his head, which sent his glance for a moment away beyond the line of furze up into the blue heavens, the lad gave answer—no longer in childish treble, but in rich, full bass. It was the old word: "Honour!"

All through the latter part of the narration, my master had been pacing restlessly up and down the room, gesticulating often with both arms in illustration of what he had to tell. He stopped now, took from the portfolio a second sketch, and handed it to me in silence.

This time I could not repress an exclamation of surprise. In my hand was the original design—I could it—of one of Strath's most famous paintings. "So you recognise 'Sir Galahad,' Harry?" he said softly. "Now you can understand why the success of that picture gave more pleasure than any other triumph I ever had. It was a faithful likeness of Dacre, you see, and that the motto should be so many have seemed appropriate, was an involuntary compliment to my boy, which tasted to me like—the nectar of the gods."

Well did I know Strath's 'Sir Galahad,' the property now of the nation. It was that picture which had placed him in the front rank of our English artists. My strength is as the strength of ten, Because my heart is pure. Who could doubt it, looking on the strong young face before me, with its noble cast of features, its clear, firm lines, the glance at once gentle, courteous, fearless, that spoke so clearly the mind within? "A beautiful face, and a beautiful story," I murmured involuntarily. Strath bent towards me and leant his arm for a moment on the elbow of my chair. "I thank you for that, Harry," he said. "And now I must try to tell you the end."

(To be concluded in our next.)

SCRAPS

An Englishman and a German were travelling together in an omnibus, and both were smoking. The German did all in his power to draw his companion into conversation, but to no purpose; at one moment he would, with an excess of politeness, apologise for drawing his attention to the fact that the ash of his cigar had fallen on his waistcoat, or a spark was endangering his neckerchief. At length the Englishman exclaimed: "Why can't you leave me alone? Your coat-tail has been burning for the last ten minutes, but I don't bother you about it!"

A man of sixty, who had long made a practice of changing his doctors on the slightest provocation, not long ago called in a young physician who had gained a considerable reputation. He was telling this doctor what he thought was the trouble with him, when the doctor ventured to disagree with his diagnosis. "I beg your pardon," said the patient, in a haughty way, "it isn't for a young physician like you to disagree with an old and experienced invalid like me! And he went out to seek another physician."
