DISCOVERED (A SHORT STORY.)

Thought the mother was dead, Mrs. James Dalton sought out Ernest when she came to London bent on hiding little Oscar, and told him her secret.

For several weeks a good part of his scanty earnings had gone to keep the mother and child. It was only when his funds were failing, when Alice was breaking down, and when the little boy had fallen ill, that Ernest Ward believed that the best brotherly service he could render her was to set Mr. Dalton on the right track.

It is but fair to give this explanation of the motives which carried Ernest Ward into Mr. Dalton's presence. As for the offered fifty pounds, if it came his way, he should put it in a bank as a nest-egg against some rainy day in the poor little widow's future career.

Oscar had been very poorly after the hurried journey to London, and the foggy atmosphere did not suit the country-born child. An attack of croup had nearly taken him from her, when Alice wrote the note which brought poor, out-at-elbow Ernest Ward to her side.

From force of habit, the habit of her childish days, she appealed to him. "Help me, help me Ernest!" "I will, my dear, I will," he answered.

"Well, if I must, I must," answered that young man. "But mind you, Alice, that the promise is made with reservations. When I see that you cannot provide for yourself and the boy, I shall find Mr. Dalton and shame him, if I can, into providing suitably for you."

"Oh, I have taught before and I shall teach again," and Alice gave him one of her old swift smiles. "You don't know what courage a mother has in working for her child. I feel ready for anything when Oscar is well again."

But Oscar did not seem to grow well; he grew worse. It was only the mother who did not appear to understand how the baby life-story was likely to end.

"Alice," her friend had said to her more than once, "let the grandfather have him for a few years—it will be best for both of you."

"Never, willingly," she answered almost angrily. "I could see him die rather than see him taken by those who would train him to forget that he had a mother."

The Midlands Squire Squire never forgot that he was a gentleman; he bowed with perfect courtesy, even though he was wondering how James could ever have been captivated by such a little and undignified specimen of womankind.

"Madam," he said ceremoniously "I believe that my son's boy is here?" "He is."

"And I have your permission to see him?" "Oh, certainly!" "Am I to understand that you have come to see matters in a more reasonable light, and that you agree to give him suitable maintenance and education and make him my heir?"

How glad was Ernest that the little woman had walked towards the door, and did not seem to hear this! It was for her—the promised fifty pounds was all for her—yet even for a moment he could not have borne that Alice should imagine he had sold her secret for gold.

"To-morrow," he murmured faintly. "I would rather leave it till to-morrow," and then, feeling stupid and dazed, and hardly knowing whether to go or to stay, he followed in the other man's steps where Mrs. James led them.

The greatest discovery for the benefit of humanity, for curing all kinds of chronic diseases in the shortest time without cutting or using instruments, and without giving pain, was made by Dr. Edelmann after 39 years exploring the globe in tracing and analysing the properties of millions of plants for medicinal purposes.

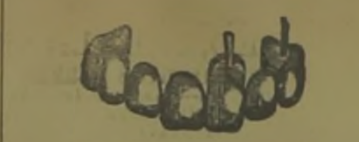

The herb in question is found in the Himalayas with great difficulty and expense, and in the island of Formosa where it is known by the name of Jorokes. It has a peculiar nature, and possesses an unusually strong magnetic power.

The following are some of the diseases on which this discovery acts with effect: Long standing secret complaints of the worst description, external as well as in the system, Diseases of the Stomach, Bladder, Kidneys and lungs; Convulsions, Chronic diarrhoea and dysentery; Yellow fever, heart disease, Influenza and all kinds of colds and coughs.
